The idea was so good, it could have been used to launch a start-up company. Fortunately for us, Xavier Courteix preferred to turn this technological nightmare into a photo novel.

From their humble beginnings on a community website, where tour guides offer customers a way of discovering unique places by broadcasting live or recording on video, Gilles and Emmanuel decide to launch a company around the concept of shared online experience: each volunteer "guide" is taken care of by an Internet user (fed , housed, clothed, etc.) in exchange for an uninterrupted journey with connected cameras. The success is overwhelming. The government wastes no time in joining the company; the project soon spreads throughout society. It isn't long before the company's first opponents make their appearance, and the first bugs, too...
