Opening our eyes to a new perspective on animals.

These days, animals abound! In countless books, all over social networks, in our courts and legislatures. But do we really understand what we're arguing about? According to François Moutou, we must first examine several paradoxes we as humans harbor in our attitude towards other animal species. What with Noah's Ark syndrome, self-appointed defenders of nature, media-orchestrated mass cooing over baby pandas, and debates between steak lovers and critics of factory farming, we've got our work cut out for us. Most importantly, however, we must observe animals closely. Only by doing so will we be able to see them clearly – through new eyes – and, at long last, do them justice.
