A playful, factual story with an environmental focus that addresses issues of protecting the rainforest and the future of the tribes living there.

Every year, nine-year-old Juma spends vacation with the Huni Kuin Indian tribe in a small village deep in the Amazon rainforest, where her mother was born. First, readers will meet Juma's relatives on her mother's side. Then they will follow her through the rainforest, learning about exotic fruit, trees, and animals. Last but not least, they will discover the ancestral traditions of her family, such as featherwork and body painting. Juma is worried about the dangers of deforestation. With the postcards at the end of the book, readers can call on people they know to help protect the rainforest, too!
