Nothing is more divisive than reality shows: while some find them risible, others find them addictive (though they may not want to admit it).

Yasmina is a 35-year-old psychologist who cannot get enough of reality TV—much to the dismay of her intellectual family! Having discovered reality shows only recently, when she could no longer avoid them, she is now totally addicted to them, an addiction that causes her as much guilt as it does delight. After the latest humiliating evening with her parents, Yasmina decides to prove to them that reality shows are a subject worthy of analysis and gets a job as a journalist on the set of a one.
