A philosopher and a schoolboy discuss the question of Europe. There's a lot to talk about, but what's it all really about?

How is it that all these people can call themselves... Europeans? When they don't share the same language, the same culture, the same laws, the same rights? This is an opportunity to look back philosophically at a history far more complex than it seems. A history shaped by conquest and migration, but rich in global influence and great aspirations. A noble idea of pooling all these resources, a dream of peace, justice and freedom—that's what Europe is all about!
