Reading this book to a child provides an occasion to share in life's bigger questions: love, interests, growing up...

Building forts from branches in the woods with friends was one of his greatest childhood pleasures. A cozy place to curl up, hidden from the world, and share secrets and feelings.

Later travels introduced him to other children, other kinds of cabins. But one day, his studies separated him from his friends, and he found himself far away from the woods of his youth, attending architecture school. He roamed cities, pencils in hand, came across the pitiful encampments of the unhoused, and then himself became a builder of houses all over the world.

In Japan, he met Matsuko, the love of his life, and one day, in a cozy place deep inside his beloved's belly, new life began.
